Common Application Essay

The most thankful sign of my work as a healthcare provider is not the mentors or hospitals, but the patients themselves, who made the decision to believe in me when they did not have a reason to do so. My experience in a clinic with a low-income population was characterized by people who were the product of language barriers, traumatic experiences, and years of systemic neglect. There was no assumption of trust, either acquired gradually or not gained at all.

One patient was initially resistant and withdrawn and did not want to be treated on multiple visits. Resistance was softened over time through having a regular presence and listening with respect. It was not drama when they gave me an opportunity to help--but it was deep. I knew at that moment that trust is a gift rather than a hope.

That experience redefined my approach to dealing with patients. I was also taught to be more patient than efficient, consent than assuming, and humble rather than reassuring. I was thankful that I got to listen instead of leading, to serve and not to command.

The appreciation motivates my engagement with community-based care and places it in close connection with the MEDEX mission of reaching different and underserved groups. My patients have also taught me that respect and not intervention is the start of healthcare. I keep that lesson to myself, and I know that once a trust is accorded, then it becomes delicate and it becomes metamorphic.
