Common Application Essay

What appeals to me most is not medicine as such, but the reaction of people when they feel weak. It is because humans tend to be sensitive, and they reach out for medical help when they are unhealthy. Throughout the experience of refugees, community outreach, and clinical treatment, I have noted that fear, displacement, and illnesses debilitate any pretentiousness and tell the truth within minutes.

Whenever the patients are vulnerable, they do not just speak volumes, but they also share values, fears, and limits of trust. I gravitate towards such situations because they require an emotional intelligence to apply on the same level as they require clinical competence. The primary knowledge of vulnerability has developed my listening abilities, speaking, and preparation to address care plans.

This interest has directed my concern to ethics, communication, and patient advocacy. It has made me realize that I cannot learn everything in technical knowledge without knowing how human beings behave under stress. This means that practical knowledge is more essential than theoretical knowledge or knowledge of nursing education. Where medicine is personal is vulnerability.

Such curiosity is expressed in Stanford's focus on human-based care, which is based on innovation. The university aims to provide human-centric care in a way that it meets modern-day demands of nursing and healthcare. The fascination with disease does not inspire me to do business, but people fascinate me about how they deal with it, make choices, and recover. Curiosity makes me attentive, flexible, and highly devoted to patient-centered practice.
